The Perry Institute for Marine Science supports marine conservation research and education and operates the Caribbean Marine Research Center, a regionally based program. Our mission is to improve and enhance the understanding of the wider Caribbean region's marine environment by supporting and conducting high quality marine research and education programs in order to provide solutions to people and our oceans. By working with a variety of partners, from federal agencies and international organizations, to non-governmental organizations, universities, foundations and private entities, the Perry Institute for Marine Science has been able to make a difference. At the institute's research center at Lee Stocking Island in the Bahamas, scientists are continually finding new ways to protect the vital undersea environment. The center is a hub for scientists who are: conducting marine research and education to help the world understand and adequately manage invaluable marine resources; searching for key elements needed to sustain healthy populations of grouper, conch, lobster, billfish, corals and other important species; developing technology for alternatives to over fishing, habitat destruction and for discovering new values from the sea; and, monitoring global climate and environmental changes for adverse effects which include sea level rise and marine ecology disruption. In addition the Perry Institute for Marine Science is playing a leading role in helping to educate future scientists as well as citizens of the U.S. and Caribbean island nations, with focus on preserving our fragile environment.
