North Central Soybean Research Program

Project's Title: Sentinel Plots to Monitor the Spread of Soybean Rust in the US Soybean Production Regions

The primary purpose of the soybean rust (SBR) sentinel network is to provide early disease detection and to function as an early warning system that producers can use to make appropriate SBR fungicide use decisions. In 2009, as in previous years since 2005, many of the observation sites in the southern U.S. were funded by the USDA through carryover dollars for all the Tier 1 states. The USDA also provided funds to support the web site infrastructure and maintenance in 2009. This project was established to provide necessary funds to support essential, monitoring activities in Tier 2 and Tier 3 states as outlined in the project proposal.

Project's Title: Population Dynamics and Epidemiology of Asian Soybean Rust in North American Soybean Production Systems

Project's Goal: The primary goal of this proposal is to develop relevant data and management strategies for the control of ASR in North America. While Florida is not a major soybean producing state, it has thousands of acres of kudzu, an alternative host of the pathogen, and high disease pressure. This is the fourth year of the study. Along with the core five objectives listed below, we have developed extensive cooperative projects with researchers throughout the U.S.

Project's Title: Soybean Aphid: Management, Biocontrol, and Host Plant Resistance

Objective 1: Chemical control/resistant variety interactions: a) Develop resistant variety-appropriate thresholds; b) Pursue development of thresholds for late R5 and R6 soybeans; c) Aphid population modeling and sampling; and d) Screen promising breeding lines:

Objective 2: Resistant varieties and interactions with biocontrol agents; a) How do natural enemies affect aphid population doubling time on Rag1 resistant lines; and are susceptible lines used as refuges for predators:

Objective 3: Biological control: a) Foreign exploration; b) Host range testing; and c) Release and follow-up monitoring:

Objective 4: Mechanisms of plant resistance: a) Plant response to aphid feeding; and b) Functional plant genomic:

Project's Title: The Sudden Death Syndrome Research Alliance

Project's Goals: Sudden death syndrome (SDS) was first observed in Arkansas in 1971 and is now widespread across most major soybean producing areas in the United States. While the incidence and severity of the disease varies by year and state, the annual soybean yield losses rank SDS as a major soybean disease in soybean production areas. The primary goal of this program is to increase soybean producer profitability by reducing yield losses caused by SDS. This proposal will focus on four main research areas: breeding and genetics, interactions between soybean cyst nematode (SCN) and SDS, improvements in greenhouse and field screening protocols, and production of transgenic soybean plants with the ability to suppress the SDS pathogen toxin movement from roots to leaves.

Project's Title: Improving Management of Soybean Cyst Nematode through Extension Demonstration and Outreach

Project's Goal: Improve soybean cyst nematode (SCN) management in the North Central states. As part of this overall goal on-farm plots in all states will be established. The focus will be on large scale demonstration to provide information usable in all states which will be merged for yearly updates in the form of fact sheets. In addition, the effects of different resistant sources on SCN populations will be demonstrated.

Project's Title: Iron Deficient Chlorosis: Getting to the Root of the Problem

Project's Goal: The project's goal is to develop useful molecular markers that can identify IDC efficient genotypes and use state of the art genomic technologies to identify genes involved in IDC efficiency or inefficiency. The ultimate goal of the research is to isolate candidate genes and develop markers for these genes that will aid the soybean breeder in developing IDC resistant varieties.

Project's Title: Screening for Genetic Resistance Against Soybean Viruses

Project's Strategic Goal: Bean pod mottle virus (BPMV), principally transmitted by the bean leaf beetle, has caused a disease of major economic import in the North Central States. Alfalfa mosaic virus (AMV), an aphid-borne virus is being detected with increasing frequency in soybeans grown in commercial fields in the North Central States apparently because of the introduction of the soybean aphid to these areas. As shown for aphid-transmitted soybean mosaic virus (SMV), control of the aphid with foliar insecticide application is unlikely to affect control of AMV. Research has suggested that foliar application of insecticide sprays to control the beetle is also unlikely to consistently control disease caused by BPMV. Genetic resistance is believed to constitute the most effective control measure for disease caused by these viruses. However, until recently, researchers have been unable to discover resistance to these viruses in soybean.

Recently, researchers have identified field tolerance to BPMV. Similarly, apparent immunity to one strain of AMV also has been identified in soybeans. These results suggest that the search for genetic resistance and for control of these diseases will be successful.

Project's Title: Construction of a DNA-based Virus Induced Gene Silencing System for Functional Genomics of Soybean Seed Development

Project's Goal: As one of the most important seed crops in the world, an understanding of the regulatory networks that shape the biochemical properties of soybean seed are becoming increasingly important. Virus induced gene silencing (VIGS) is a powerful tool for functional genomics that permits inactivation of individual genes or closely related gene families. Inactivation of genes through VIGS is most effective in cells where recombinant viruses replicate. Tobacco streak virus (TSV), a virus that commonly infects soybean, readily invades meristematic tissues and developing soybean embryos, which results in high rates of seed transmission (often >50%). Consequently, VIGS vectors based on TSV would permit the analysis of gene function in tissue types (e.g., shoot apical and floral meristems) and developmental stages (e.g., developing seed) that would be very difficult to affect using VIGS vectors currently available for soybean, which do not invade and replicate within these tissues.

Project's Title: Development of High-throughput DNA-based Gene Silencing Technology for Soybeans

Project Goals: The project's goal is to understand the genetic pathways involved in stress resistance to enable the development of soybean germplasm with new defensive features that will lead to the breeding of soybean varieties that respond less to the variation of growing conditions. The specific objectives are to: 1) Optimize BPMV-DNA-based vector for developing of a virus-based high-throughput gene silencing system; 2) Use high-throughput gene silencing to identify soybean genes involved in resistance to biotic and abiotic stress; and 3) Select appropriate genes for development of soybean germplasm with new defensive features.

Objective 4) Distribute additional VIGS vectors containing test genes to cooperators for testing against selected biotic stressors; cooperators continue assessment and confirm gene silencing where assessment is positive: Constructs developed as indicated above are being distributed to collaborators for assessment. The collaborators are making major progress on achieving the project's goals.

Project Title: Managing Frogeye Leaf Spot and Charcoal Rot in the North Central Region

Project's Goals: The goal of this nine state project is to develop management options for two soybean diseases, frogeye leaf spot (FLS) and charcoal rot. Specifically, researchers are evaluating genetic resistance to these diseases, developing techniques for assaying resistance, characterizing prominent pathotypes of the pathogens, and updating technical information on the incidence, severity and management. For both diseases, host resistance is the focus of the group to deliver long-term management options for the producer.
