Broomcorn research

I am continuing to select for dwarf broomcorn varieties with acceptable characteristics. In 2005, 28 rows out of 1000 rows were selected for advancement in 2006. With some rows we had multiple pollinations. In 2006, 1,200 rows derived from 46 single plant selections in 2005 were planted in four to six row plots depending on seed supply. In 2007, 46 individual head selections from 2006 were planted as head rows in six row plots. Tim Monahan helped select heads with favorable characteristics. Three weeks later we had enough disease to make additional selections. Individual plants from head rows with favorable characteristics were selected for advancement. We selected 39 individual heads based on brush quality and disease resistance. I tried to eliminate anything that had seed on the side of the brush and multiple tillers. In 2008 we planted 636 rows from the 29 individual heads. We planted about three weeks later than usual because of cold wet weather. Of the 39 heads selected in 2007, 34 are related to T309 x ms2ms2 and five are related to 436 x ms2ms2. All of the selections had good resistance to anthracnose and none had seed along the side of the brush. We have not had a problem with center stems since 2005. We had more tillers than most years. Part of that may be due to late planting cool soils that resulted in lower plant populations than previous years. Brush quality is good and I selected 35 individual heads for advancement. Unfortunately none can be harvested by snapping the heads. We usually get the plant to break at the second internode. I also kept three heads that had relatively fine brush quality in case someone is interested in whisk brooms.

In 2009, we planted 286 rows from the 35 individual heads selected for advancement in 2008. As in 2008, planting conditions were cold and wet and in some selections populations were lower than we would like. Therefore, we had more tillering than we would like. Disease resistance was very good in all selections especially considering the wet summer. Tim Monahan and I selected six families from the 35 individual heads from 2008. I saved seed from 20 to 30 individual plants from the six families. Those will be planted next year in four to six row plots. The brush quality is good and did not have center stems or side branch branches. All but one of the selections is related to T309 x ms2ms2 and the other is 436 x ms2ms2. I think we are to a point where one more summer of selection would be useful and then we will need to greatly increase seed for commercial use. Unfortunately, none of the selections will snap for harvest and most heads have the flag leaf is around the brush at the very bottom of the head. That seems to be a characteristic of most dwarf selections with good brush quality.

I expect to be able to release several varieties in the next two years. Unfortunately, I do not know how widely they will be used. A major problem is there still is no source of certified seed in the United States. Therefore, the recently released varieties and future varieties may not be available once the supply of seed at University of Illinois is depleted. We do not have enough money to get into the seed business and it will be a losing proposition. The University administration discourages sales of products through the University although it can be done.

Sweet sorghum research

In 2007 I planted a number of sweet sorghum selections and made hybrids by crossing them with a ROX male sterile that Henry had created. I went to China that August and was able to get the parents of five Chinese hybrids because I had a plant introduction permit from the U.S. federal governmental. We grew the parents in the winter in a quarantine greenhouse on campus and increased seed and made the Chinese hybrids. Generally, the male parents are Chinese and the female of at least three are from Texas A&M. The Chinese have hybrids that are being used for ethanol production in very arid conditions where they cannot grow corn. In my mind they have made a wise decision not to use corn for ethanol and not replace any acreage suitable for corn with sweet sorghum. I drafted a proposal to be submitted to CFAR which is a grant program funded by the state of Illinois. Unfortunately the program is dying due to lack of funds and they did not call for proposals the last two years

In 2009 we continued increasing seed and some was planted by Fred Below to determine sugar yields per acre. High sugar yield will determine if any of the hybrids will be useful for ethanol production. I doubt much would be grown in Illinois but because sorghum is very drought tolerant it may be most useful in Western states where irrigation water is becoming less plentiful. I will continue to try to find funding for ethanol from sweet sorghum because some of the hybrids from China are very good in terms of plant size.

Research on Aspergillus ear rot and aflatoxin production

Aflatoxin is a causal agent of human liver cancer. It also causes a number of other health problems for animals and humans. My project on breeding for resistance in corn is proceeding nicely. This summer we had four locations in Texas planted by BH Genetics. These locations included Ganado, Malone, Wharton, and Uvale. At each location we had 35 test crosses between the better versions of LH195 with resistance to aflatoxin production and a number of male inbreds. Two of the locations were inoculated with Aspergillus flavus and at the other two we relied on natural infection. From all four locations we now have data on yield and are in the process of analyzing grain for aflatoxin accumulation. The environmental conditions in South Texas were extremely hot and dry resulting in very low yield at two locations that were not irrigated. A number of the test cross resistant hybrids performed rather well for yield compared with commercially used hybrids At Urbana we are evaluating 29 test cross hybrids with the newer versions of LH195RR with chromosome 4 segments associated with resistance from Mp313E for aflatoxin accumulation in grain following inoculation. We also are evaluating 37 other test crosses between resistant versions of FR1064 and commercially available male lines. We have seven versions of each 3 inbreds with the appropriate markers on chromosome 4 from Mp313E that were transferred to Monsanto and will be advanced by them and also by me here.

I also made crosses with nine plant introductions from Nigeria and Mp313E to start backcrossing resistance into those materials. I am hoping to get grant funding in the future from the Gates Foundation which is very interested in human health in Africa. As always, I will need a certain amount of preliminary data with the African materials to prove the research will likely be successful. Monsanto is making use of resistance and crossing it into their newer generation of corn hybrids. They are particularly interested in having some level of resistance to aflatoxin production in their newer drought resistant hybrids.

Most of this work was funded by USDA, The National Corn Growers Association, and the Texas Corn Promotion Board. Unfortunately, the money from USDA was "ear marked" funds and was not renewed for 2009. If I run out of money for a technician I will go out of business. Aflatoxin could become important in Illinois in the Midwestern states because it is concentrated in distillers dry grains which are a byproduct of ethanol production.

Overall funding for research

In previous years I had been able to obtain $60,000 $120,000 for aflatoxin resistance. Unfortunately the USDA money will not be renewed until at least 2011. The National Corn Growers Association eliminated their funding for projects on aflatoxin this spring. The Texas Corn Producers Board will still fund but only at $10-$12000 a year which is not enough to continue. Fortunately another faculty member is now using my technician three-quarter time and I will be able to keep him for broomcorn and corn projects that could be funded by chemical companies. Chemical company funding and projects are usually not known until January or February.

BROOMCORN RESEARCH REPORT 2009
Henry H. Hadley

My recent and current research has consisted mainly of selection for decorative types of broomcorn from a genetically heterogeneous pool of material. This pool was generated over a period of forty or so years, on the side so to speak, as I was concentrating on other problems. So I have no good pedigree records and no pure lines. But I evaluated head selections over the years by progeny rows and some lines have become relatively uniform in plant morphology and in head or brush characteristics.

Selections have been made for various colors and inflorescence morphology, not just for good broomcorn types. Some selections have seed almost the full length of the fibers. Some have fibers that are quite short. Some have fiber wave. Some even crook. I emphasize variety because all crafts people may not be interested in brooms but in fibers for weaving or heads that can make interesting bouquets, etc.

My immediate goal is to accumulate enough seed of the best lines so that I, or someone else in my place, can give small quantities of seed to crafts people to plant and evaluate as possible source material for their craft work. I would be especially happy if someone would be interested in growing some lines for commercial seed production so that they, rather than the University of Illinois, could be the future source of seed for crafts people. The lack of commercial seed producers of broomcorn, as Don points out, is a real problem. We have no seed producers available, to my knowledge, and we don't want to be seed producers ourselves, only seed developers.

I am making arrangements to meet with crafts people at Bishop Hill, Illinois to discuss different types of lines that I have and to help them make a small planting of source material in 2010. Crafts people there have had a sort of community planting in past years, from which individual crafts people could get material for his or her own project. But recently the plantings have yielded poor material, another case apparently of "running out".

I would like contacts with other people who might be interested in receiving samples of what I have available but am in need of assistance in getting them. Perhaps Sam could supply a list or even act as a link between me and potential "customers". I don't feel competitive about it in any way. Perhaps we could just put our situation on the internet and see what happens, but obviously we would need someone who is acquainted with setting up an informational website to assist us and also some part-time staff to answer queries and requests for samples

For 2010 I plan to plant 100 progenies mostly in two-row plots but a few in four-row plots to use up 300 rows in the broomcorn nursery if Don can handle that. I will try to increase seed supplies and describe lines in more detail as to plant height, seed color, head shape, and any other unique characteristics. I could also supply photographs of various types available for distribution if we had information on the web.

I do not know how much my work is adding to the cost of our broomcorn research project since I have had no input concerning our financial situation and have not asked for any. I think my main cost has been in paying the University of Illinois for its services and for land and greenhouse use. I know that finances are a problem for us since the recession. If we succeed in getting a supply of seed that can be sent to people interested in trying out some broomcorn lines and advertise that fact, there will be some additional costs including some for extra labor. But I do believe the extra cost would be justified. The way things seem to be going in the broom industry, the use of decorative types may be the last remaining use of broomcorn in the United States.

RESEARCH PROGRESS
by Sam Moyer, Ph D Geneticist and Broomsquire

GREEN

This year's crop again confirmed that machine harvestable dwarf varieties have been achieved There are slight genetic differences in some individual varieties, gene pools and hybrids All have NO CENTER STEM, "handles"(peduncles) at least 10" long, but might vary how much the top leaf covers the knuckle The brush is bright/dark early, then many colors develop when fully mature I might have established an aqua/blue variety. Dr Hadley sent seeds of a dark green variety that I will maintain

Weather is now the main performance factor Planters of my seeds in MI, WI, ND, and WY report short brush due to cool weather. Planters in VA and TX had good performance. One in NY tried no herbicide and had a weed problem with too much rain

Thanks to excessive rain and enough hot days, my acre and half yielded 498 lbs (including 10" peduncles) of which 272 lbs was 18" or longer. This could have been more if I didn't experiment with some low yielding varieties

I had good performance planting "no-till" spraying Round-up and Bicep mix two weeks before planting In an experiment on a small area, seeds NOT treated with Concep sprouted nearly as good as treated ones In another experimental area, Bicep was NOT reapplied after 6 weeks and no weed problem Both experiments might have been OK due to constant excessive rain, needs replicating to be sure that one application of Bicep with seeds not treated with Concep is OK

I learned the hard way that seeds from some types are too large for the radish plate, okra plate is needed with most holes taped shut I will check seed size after cleaning ("debearding" and winnowing) and tell when sending seeds.

Broadcasting seeds might not be good due to inadequate spacing control. Rows might be needed for weed control and using a reaper

The BIG news A local fabricator completed a reaper attachment to a sickle bar mower, but not in time to harvest Needed some minor alterations (We did "Ag engineering research") Details available

Tall sorghum for as an ingredient for PAPER pulp Confirmed production of tall seedless hybrids BUT for the first time, if they had no seeds (were bagged) side branches formed with little seed heads Might have been the excessive rain The source of the "Woody" parent 15+ years ago, Dr Fred Miller, recently said he obtained it from Egypt where it was used for firewood and paper I sent him some of these seeds a year ago, he is analyzing ligin content

SILLY experiment I had a "pet" tall grain sorghum plant with a big head full of big seeds that was the cross between tall grain sorghum ("Woody") with big head full of big seeds X a dwarf 4N with little head with poor seed set of big seeds (created by Dr Hadley by doubling chromosomes) I bagged it, so it self fertilized Next year it should produce many combinations. I want to learn why it might be impossible to have dwarf grain sorghum with a head like the tall grain sorghum!
