SIOUXLAND FLOODING 2011

A community still in adjustment 7 months after Missouri River flood

DECEMBER 17, 2011 10 30 PM

It did not start with great fanfare. There was no rush of water, no tidal wave rolling from the north.

Rather, the Missouri River rose, first a little, then by feet and feet.

It would take months to fix the aftermath -- the waterlogged sandbags, the pounds of mildew-coated drywall, the psychological scars of a summer lost to worries about rescuing family photo albums and whether the neighborhood would survive.

These were the concerns of people profiled in our pages during the Missouri River flooding this spring and summer. Seven months later, we decided to revisit some of the victims to see how they've survived -- and what's next in the long path to bringing life back to normal.

These are their stories.

LOSS AND RECOVERY

When looking for a home, Rita and Roy Dunlap had one main requirement: nothing next to water. If the house so much as had a sump pump, they weren't interested.

They've had enough water.

On June 10, they left their home near the Missouri River in Decatur, Neb., as floodwaters approached. When they could finally return in September, they found a house in which water had been up to 6 feet deep.

"You just plain wanted to sit down and cry. It was mold up to the ceilings, mud everywhere," Rita Dunlap said.

The house was a total loss and, since they didn't own the land on which their house stood, they chose to move. They used money they received from the Federal Emergency Management Agency to help pay for a house in Erwin, S.D., near several lakes where they like to fish.

In the meantime, they found shelter in a friend's house near Oakland, Neb. Rita said she, Roy and their disabled daughter who lives with them will move yet this fall or in the spring.

"The way it worked out, we did wind up with a home, but we would have kind of rather stayed here," she said.

A VIEW ALTERED

Although the doors to Murdo's Aten Resort never closed as flood waters threatened the property two miles east of Gavins Point Dam, owner Don Edwards said that last summer was hardly business as normal.

"As soon as the flooding began, we'd be getting 20 to 30 phone calls asking if we're OK," he recalled. "Guess there was a rumor going around that we floated down the river."

When uncertainties about the Missouri increased, Edwards said he lost about 20 party bookings for wedding receptions at the rural Crofton, Neb., restaurant.

Edwards was able to recoup some of those losses with increased business generated by visitors wanting to see Gavins Point Dam's historically high releases of water.

With a gazebo, used for small parties, closed due to the threat of flooding and 20 semitrailer loads of concrete chunks dumped along the river banks to keep the Missouri from eating away at the shore, Edwards tried to run the business as he's done for the past 22 years.

"Our building was safe, our deck was safe and it still gave folks one heck of a view as the river goes by," he said. "Only now the river was closer than ever before."

Even though the lower deck needed to be cleaned and the river bank is now 4 feet shorter, Murdo's Aten Resort is once again the tranquil place Edwards always wanted it to be.

"There's a large cottonwood tree that shades our deck, which we were afraid would be swept up in the river's current," he said. "Well, the cottonwood survived and is still standing, and so are we."

A MISSION WITH NO END

Even though the floodwaters are gone, the work continues for emergency responders. Their mission now is making sure it never happens again.

"We're working on the recovery process now and doing the damage assessment," said Woodbury County Disaster and Emergency Services Director Gary Brown.

Brown and dozens of other Sioux City and Woodbury County officials manned the Emergency Operations Center on the campus of Western Iowa Tech Community College from Memorial Day through August. Later this month, officials will meet with their counterparts in all six Iowa counties affected by the flooding.

"We will review what went well, what didn't and then make recommendations" to various federal and state agencies, he said, as well as making recommendations to local governments about including money in upcoming budgets for future flood-control measures.

Unlike last year, Brown said, "We're going to be watching the river much closer this winter than ever before. We will get bi-weekly reports from the (Army) Corps of Engineers."

BACK FROM THE BRINK

For weeks this summer, Bev's on the River straddled a fine line between survival and a watery grave in the Missouri River.

Jesse Miller, chief operating officer of Bev's parent company, Midwest Franchise Corp., said saving the Sioux City eatery and riverfront sister companies Jolly Rogers Bar & Grill, Hilton Garden Inn and Mlr Tym Landing from the floodwaters was a race against the clock.

"We were slowly losing access," Miller recalled. "The roads were getting covered, so we knew our days were numbered."

The water eventually closed in, flowing across the parking lot and cutting off access to the businesses, which employed 150 people.

"Walking through the building was very eerie, and it was like a war zone or something," Miller said. "There was helicopters flying over and walls of dirt surrounding you."

Despite the dark days this summer, Bev's and the Hilton Garden Inn emerged relatively unscathed and reopened in September. All but the seasonal employees at Jolly Rogers and the marina have been hired back, Miller said.

Even so, Miller said the flood left a financial mark on the company.

Midwest Franchise spent about $1 million in materials and labor to protect Bev's and the surrounding properties, Miller estimates, losing more than $1 million in revenue from the restaurant being closed all summer.

"There was a big financial impact that we will not make up in a quick time period, but over time we hope to make up for it," Miller said.

CONSTANT REMINDERS

Steve Luft rarely got a reprieve from summer 2011 Missouri River flooding worries.

Not only did he sandbag his 315 W. Third St. home in early June, when Luft was at work at Burke Engineering and driving around the metro area, he got almost constant reminders of the weeks of flooding.

"Everywhere you go in town, you see sandbags, you see people trying, you know. They are in the same situation you are, so it is constantly on your mind," he said.

"It was months. Most people will take a vacation in the summertime. You didn't want to go nowhere. I mean, it was like, 'Geez, if I leave, what am I gonna come home to?'" Luft said.

Water rose well up on the sandbags near his walkout basement facing the river. Luft had frequent sleepless nights worrying about whether the sandbags would hold up, and ultimately his home came away unscathed.

"There was no ease -- not only until the river started going down, but it took it a while to go back out of my yard, down under the banks, before I ever really even felt comfortable," he said.

Luft spent $800 on pumps, sand bags and then grass seed to replant once the river subsided. He's hopeful his sand/dirt backyard will bloom green in 2012.

"I actually survived pretty good," Luft said.

WATCHING THE LEVEL

All summer, Linda and Joe Mildorfer lived a simple lifestyle.

Only the bare essentials -- bed, appliances and a few changes of clothes -- were left in their West Third Street home after they packed up the rest of their belongings to protect them from the approaching Missouri River.

A dike built down the middle of the street ended just before it reached their home.

Fortunately, the water never reached their home either, stopping at the dike about half a block away. That didn't ease the stress they and their neighbors felt all summer.

"It was an unhappy summer for a lot of us," Linda Mildorfer said.

The Mildorfers spent $1,200 to rent a semitrailer in which to store their belongings. They didn't bother filing for flood assistance, Linda said, because their house never had water in it.

They moved their belongings back in and removed the sandbags from around their house in late August. Damage done by the river is visible a short distance away.

They'll be buying flood insurance in January.

And come spring, Linda said, they'll be paying much closer attention to the river.

"We'll be watching, listening and waiting."

While no good came out of this summer's Missouri River flooding for people living along its banks, the flood's long-term effects on the river itself will likely be both beneficial and harmful.

Tim Cowman, director of the Missouri River Institute at the University of South Dakota at Vermillion, said the flood was so powerful that it scoured a new channel for the free-flowing river between South Dakota and Nebraska.

"Flooding changes the energy of the river," Cowman said. It produced new backwaters and wetlands that nurture life on the low end of the food chain. The flooding scoured the channel deeper but also built up high new natural sandbars -- ideal nesting habitat for endangered bird species. The shallow water alongside the sandbars and new riverbank creates a good nesting habitat for fish. But the channels could also speed bank erosion.

"A blessing with a lot of uncertainty," is what Mark Dixon, USD assistant professor of biology, calls the 2011 flood. He predicts its impact on trees and plants will be mixed, too. Some native cottonwoods and many non-native tree species will die slowly, suffocated by floodwaters. But the wetlands created by the receding flood are ideal for germinating new cottonwoods and other native flora.

At the same time, Dixon expects the noxious invasive weed purple loosestrife, nearly eradicated, to colonize in new areas that will have to be found and the weed fought anew.

Time will tell how the river's own flood story turns out.
