	In 2013, the Center for Applied Rationality (CFAR) worked to develop a set of tools to think clearly and act effectively, ran workshops to train people to use these skills, and ran a week-long summer program for mathematically gifted high school students. CFAR's research into human cognition and decision making drew on the academic cognitive science literature, studies conducted by CFAR, and on-the-ground experience with people attempting to learn and implement techniques CFAR developed based largely on the aforementioned academic literature. A randomized controlled trial of CFAR's summer 2012 workshops was completed, which involved surveying participants from these workshops and a control group one year later. Similar research was conducted on the non-randomized group of workshop participants from summer 2012, as part of a longitudinal study. Based on the results of these studies, CFAR developed a new survey which it began using for longitudinal research on participants at the fall and winter 2013 workshops. CFAR also conducted online tests of probability estimation techniques, and surveyed a broad cross-section of the rationality community on the practical benefits of rationality. Regular one-on-one phone sessions with workshop alumni provided qualitative data on the use and implementation of the techniques taught at workshops (in addition to assisting the alumni with this implementation). Four all-CFAR staff retreats provided opportunities for in-depth analysis and refinement of the rationality curriculum being developed. CFAR ran seven four-day workshops in which participants received intensive training in rationality techniques that they could make use of in their daily lives. The workshops were an immersive experience, with instructors and participants staying on site and approximately a 4:1 participant to instructor ratio. After the workshop, each participant received six one-hour phone sessions with a CFAR instructor to work on implementing the techniques in their daily lives. In addition to these seven workshops, CFAR also provided a full day of rationality training to attendees at the 2013 Effective Altruism Summit and to the participants at a smaller CFAR workshop in Salt Lake City. CFAR also ran the Summer Program for Applied Rationality and Cognition (SPARC), a two-week program aimed at mathematically talented high school students to introduce them to methods of bridging between their mathematical skills and strong practical decision-making skills. SPARC was held on the University of California Berkeley campus. The program drew a strong team of people with, or finishing, a Ph.D. in mathematics who volunteered their time for instruction and operations, in addition to most of the CFAR staff. This resulted in roughly a 4:1 student to instructor ratio. This first pass at the program was successful enough that plans were made to continue running SPARC, and most of the participants of this first 2013 SPARC reapplied for the 2014 SPARC.
