Malaria continues to be a major infectious disease threatening the health of American travelers and military personnel during their travel overseas. This project is designed to enhance surveillance for tracking the importation of drug resistant malaria parasites into the U.S. and to develop molecular tools for the surveillance of resistant parasites in order to provide appropriate treatment and to prevent death due to malaria. In addition, data from this study will help to develop prophylactic guidelines and prevention strategies to minimize the acquisition of drug resistant malaria for U.S. citizens and military personnel. Also included are expenditures for all other program services.
