| Research, Investigations, and Rescue PETA receives complaints of cruelty to animals, works for the release of and obtains care for abused, neglected, and at-risk animals, investigates cruelty cases, conducts undercover investigations, gathers evidence of law violations, and takes action to ensure the enforcement of laws and regulations in an effort to protect the animals involved. In response to a whistleblower complaint, PETA investigated the Osborne Farm dairy in North Carolina and found emaciated and lame cows forced to live in a 3-foot-deep pool of their own liquefied manure, which left them to suffer from skin ulcers and painful hoof ailments. As a result of this exposé, Piedmont Milk Sales and Ingles Markets Milkco ended their relationships with the farm, the owner was cited after it was discovered that some of the manure was washing into a nearby creek, and the farm was shut down. PETA pressured New Mexico's lawmakers to let the states most recent ag-gag bill die without even having a committee hearing on it. Ag-gag statutes criminalize whistle-blowing investigations at factory farms and specifically target animal advocates who expose cruelty to animals. This is an important victory that will protect crucial eyewitness investigations, which reveal blatant, often illegal animal abuse on factory farms. A PETA eyewitness investigation of Deployment Medicine International (DMI), the U.S. military's leading contractor for trauma training courses, documented instructors shooting live pigs with shotguns and cutting open the animals to cause massive bleeding. At least one pig woke up while being cut open. Footage also showed instructors ramming a metal rod through at least one pig's leg, cutting into his abdomen, pulling out part of his intestines, and shooting him in the face, blowing off his jaw. Following the release of the investigation, the owner of DMI lost his medical license and the company was indefinitely suspended from receiving any federal contracts. As a result of PETAs efforts, India has now added imported animal-tested cosmetics and their ingredients to the existing ban on all cosmetics testing on animals, the U.K. introduced a ban on testing household products on animals, and the Canadian government is reevaluating its requirement to test citronella bug sprays on animals. Following PETAs recommendations, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) plans to incorporate the results of non-animal methods as a step toward its goal of developing a set of in vitro methods to replace all animal tests in its Endocrine Disruptor Screening Program, which has the potential to spare millions of animals' lives. The PETA scientists associated with the PETA International Science Consortium also hosted an international workshop at the EPA headquarters with the goal of designing a non-animal test that could replace the use of rats in inhalation toxicity studies. PETAs investigation of Primate Products, Inc., a Florida facility that imports hundreds of monkeys every year and sells them to laboratories, uncovered sick and injured monkeys who were denied adequate veterinary care, including for exposed bones in their tails and fingers, workers routinely grabbing monkeys by the tails, and monkeys kept outside without heat throughout the winter. As a result of the investigation, the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) cited the company for 25 violations of the Animal Welfare Act. After PETA filed complaints and requests asking the USDA to conduct investigations in response to incidents in which children were bitten by dolphins, SeaWorld Orlando announced that its ending its public dolphin-feeding program. PETAs international exposé of the exotic-skins industry in Africa and the U.S. revealed the appalling conditions in which crocodiles and alligators are raised and/or killed on factory farms for Hermès luxury goods. Alligators are packed into dank pools and crocodiles are crowded into barren concrete pits for months or even years before finally being slaughtered for their skins. Workers were documented crudely hacking into the necks of some alligators and trying to scramble their brains with metal rods. Some reptiles were still conscious, flailing and kicking, even minutes after workers tried to kill them. As a result, Jane Birkin requested that Hermès remove her name from the crocodile Birkin bags. Following PETAs calls for stronger whipping regulations in the U.S. including for the Kentucky Derby, in which Triple Crown winner American Pharoah was whipped more than 30 times, the California Horse Racing Board implemented the strictest regulation in the country governing the use of whips in horse racing. Other lifesaving reforms were made in the horse-racing industry, thanks to PETA, including the introduction of legislation mandating federal drug intervention, the adoption of new, stronger rules to eliminate electro-shock devices in California, a lawsuit against Thoroughbred horse trainer Steve Asmussen by the federal Department of Labor, and the filing of felony charges against jockey Roman Chapá for allegedly using an electric shock device during a race. Because of PETAs efforts, Kora and Justice, two dogs from two different cases who were found with collars embedded in their necks, were rescued and adopted into new loving homes, a Corpus Christi, Texas man, who allegedly lifted his dog by the neck, punched and threw the dog to the ground, and dragged the dog inside his house, had the dog seized from him and is now facing charges related to the incident, and a Virginia father and daughter, whose emaciated and starving dog Peaches had to be euthanized after she was found suffering from a foul-smelling infection caused by a horribly embedded collar that had sawed into her neck and caused a 1-inch cut, were found guilty of cruelty to animals and sentenced to 12 months jail time (the man will ultimately serve six of the 12 months, and his daughter will serve three). Both have been banned from owning any other animals for life. PETA was also responsible for obtaining punishment for a number of other individuals around the nation for abusing or neglecting animals. PETAs Community Animal Project, which provides animals in the Hampton Roads, Virginia, area with hands-on help, handled more than 2,000 calls for assistance, rescued more than 2,700 animals, built and delivered more than 250 free doghouses, which brings the total number of doghouses built since the program started to more than 6,200, and bagged 1,800 bales of straw, providing warm, dry shelter for dogs forced to live outdoors. PETAs Mobile Clinics Division spayed and neutered 11,131 cats and dogs in southeastern Virginia and northeastern North Carolina, including 457 feral cats and 564 pit bulls, at a discounted rate or free of charge. PETA instituted Operation Animals, a program-wide military discount that offers reduced-cost surgeries to active-duty and retired military service members, partnered with two Virginia shelters to offer free monthly clinics, held a multi-shelter dog adopt-a-thon at its Bea Arthur Dog Park, and hosted a chicken adoption event at its Los Angeles office, the Bob Barker Building, during which 97 chickens found loving homes. |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |                         |                                  |               |

| Public Outreach and Education PETA conducts educational campaigns and publishes materials that are distributed to students, teachers, the general public, and supporters. These efforts include making materials available for younger children, high school and college students, and educators as well as publishing factsheets, booklets, fliers, posters, and PETAs magazine, Animal Times. Our campaigns, which reach millions of people and receive extensive media coverage, involve renowned celebrities, interactive social networking, website features, blog posts, and public service announcements, which are typically placed for free in high-exposure outlets. In fiscal year 2015, PETA logged more than 4,500 interactions with the media via letters, tweets, and radio, TV, and print interviews. PETA also had more than 62 million visits to its various websites. | International Grassroots Campaigns PETA organizes campaigns to inform the public about the abuse and slaughter of animals in the food, clothing, experimentation, and entertainment industries, among others. In 2015, PETA helped organize more than 1,450 demonstrations and sent out several million letters and e-mails to urge companies and individuals to make changes that benefit animals. Influenced by PETAs continuing efforts to end dehorning in the dairy industry, companies such as General Mills, Dannon, Chipotle, and Denny's have stated their support of and purchasing preference for polled, or naturally hornless, cattle, paving the way for the elimination of the painful dehorning process (i.e., cutting or searing off calves' horns with no pain relief). PETA also persuaded IKEA to add vegan meatballs to its in-store menus, worked with a cemetery in Amherst, New York, to retrofit its spiked fence in order to prevent deer from becoming fatally impaled on it, and helped enact a bullhook ban in Oakland, California, and Richmond, Virginia. Numerous companies, including United Airlines, JetBlue, Virgin America, Hyundai Motor America, World Travel Guide, DestinationCoupons.com, and the Miami Dolphins football franchise, severed ties with SeaWorld after hearing from PETA, and PETAs relentless public pressure on SeaWorld has led to an 84 percent drop in its profits from 2014. PETAs youth division, peta2, interacted with more than 250,000 young people at colleges, various music festivals, and other events and took along the I, Chicken exhibit, which uses cutting-edge virtual reality technology and allows students to see life from the perspective of a chicken who will be killed for food. Following 35 years of pressure and protesting from PETA, Ringling Bros. and Barnum &amp; Bailey Circus announced that it will end its elephant performances by 2018. Bill Cunningham, the largest Shrine circus producer in the U.S., eliminated all wild animal acts from his shows. After hearing from PETA, 11 retailers, including Inditex (the world's largest clothing retailer), Esprit, bebe, and Adidas, joined the list of over 80 companies that have banned angora, the production of which involves painfully nipping the fur out of rabbits' skin. PETA persuaded Mercedes-Benz USA to make the base model of its new smart fortwo (C453) completely leather-free and prompted Williams-Sonoma to add a synthetic down option for every down option it offers. PETA also got numerous events, including circuses, a Pamplona-style bull run in California, a coyote-killing contest, a petting zoo, a hermit crab giveaway, and live-animal exhibits canceled, persuaded retailer Anthropologie to pull an ad featuring an elephant and to enact a policy against using elephants in ads, and persuaded Endemol Shine North America not to air a segment of Gordan Ramsay's show MasterChef that featured a chimpanzee. Among other things, PETA succeeded in getting Alliance Residential Company, the ninth-largest apartment management company in the nation, to stop using glue traps and CBL &amp; Associates to stop allowing Pocket Pets to sell sugar gliders in its malls. Rite Aid pharmacy also removed all Teddy Tanks stuffed animals with betta fish tanks in their stomachs from its shelves after hearing from PETA.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |                         |                                  |               |
