990 Schedule O, Supplemental Information

Return Reference	Explanation
Client Note 1	Client Note 1 - Headwaters Economics 2015 Form 990 AccomplishmentsHeadwaters Economics analyzed the more than 15,000 wildfires that burned in the continental United States from 2000-2013, finding that such fires increasingly are threatening urban areasoften repeatedlyputting more homes, lives, infrastructure, and other resources at risk. To more fully address future wildfire risks, Headwaters Economics authored a white paper that offers nine ideas for how best to alter the pace, scale, and pattern of future home development. Headwaters Economics also published a related journal article, in the March-April 2015 edition of The Solutions Journal, that describes the trends in wildfires, the challenge of defending private property, the solutions tried to date, and new ideas that could significantly reduce costs and risks by altering the pattern of future home building on fire-prone lands. Headwaters Economics wrote a report in cooperation with Summit County, Colorado that provides recommendations for how that community can improve and strengthen its approach to addressing wildfire risks. The lessons from this case study can help other local governments and federal policy makers develop best practices, lessons, and tools to reduce future wildfire risks. Headwaters Economics continued to update and host online the Economic Profile System (EPS)created in cooperation with the Bureau of Land Management and the U.S. Forest Servicewith the latest published statistics from federal data sources. This free, easy-to-use software produces detailed socioeconomic reports of communities, counties, states, and regions, including custom aggregations and comparisons. In a related effort, Headwaters Economics updated the data interactive, West-Wide Economic Atlas, that allows the public to better understand socioeconomic trends (e.g., sources of personal income, population, employment and growth by industry, land ownership) at the county and state level for the continental U.S. West. Headwaters Economics created a set of national interactive maps that show how federal land payments (Payments in Lieu of Taxes, Secure Rural Schools, etc.) are distributed to counties and states. The data include more than twenty years of payments history and trends as well as programs receiving payments, the percent of a county or states budget that comes from federal land payments, and projections of what would happen to federal land payments if the Secure Rural Schools program is not reauthorized. As part of Headwaters Economics work with rural communities, we again updated and published data and two interactive maps that show the range of commercial activities on National Forests, and details on the timber economy, including gross receipts, timber harvest sales, and timber cuts. Both maps show U.S. Forest Service activity at three levels: National Forests, National Forest Regions, and states. Headwaters Economics updated the Payments from Federal Lands report that is part of the Economic Profile System (EPS) to include the latest available data for federal land payments to county governments from programs such as Payments in Lieu of Taxes. Headwaters Economics also assisted various congressional and county staff with data and research as background to county payment legislative proposals, and provided local and state officials with county and state-level analysis. Headwaters Economics published a graphical and data analysis of the Land and Water Conservation Fund (LWCF) for the years 2011-2014. The report offers a comprehensive data base and state-level visualization that shows the variety of LWCF benefits provided to the public, and also the number, acreage, and funding involved with all projects during this time frame. Headwaters Economics later updated this research to analyze how much LWCF funding went to federal or non-federal projects, and to assess which congressional districts most benefited from LWCF spending during the 2011-2015 timeframe. Headwaters Economics updated the interactive analysis of the economic impact of every National Park Service unit in the country, National Park Service Units: Economic Impacts of Visitation and Expenditures, to include 2014 visitation, spending, employment, and income data. These data are used widely by gateway communities to understand and track the economic impacts of nearby National Park Service units. Headwaters Economics produced a report that summarizes Montanas economy, analyzing how it has grown and what is driving its performance, including a description of how federal lands help attract people, investment, and businesses. Headwaters Economics completed work on three major research projects about federal royalty policies concerning coal and other fossil fuels. The first report reviews problems with the current federal royalty system for coal, estimates current effective royalty rates, and offers several reform options. The analysis found that moving valuation from the mine price to the market price simplifies the process, creates transparency, lowers administrative costs, and allows for a more accurate assessment of whether taxpayers are receiving a fair return. The second report reviews proposals to reform the way federal coal is valued for federal royalty assessment. The research found that reforms would have substantial revenue benefits for federal and state governments, and limited impact on coal production or prices on federal lands. It would also increase the transparency of the assessment process. The third report provides an analysis that shows how proposed federal royalty reforms will increase the cost of delivering natural gas to domestic power plants by a greater amount than coal. As a result, the potential reforms are unlikely to cause additional fuel switching from coal to natural gas in the electric power sector. Headwaters Economics also published an updated interactive analysis showing what local governments in eleven oil and natural gas producing states receive from associated production taxes. The analysis shows how revenues and distributions vary by state policy, land ownership, and well productivity. Local governments, which bear the greatest impacts of energy production, rely on energy revenues to help them mitigate impacts and plan for long-term economic development. Headwaters Economics published a Trails Research and Searchable Benefits Library with more than 90 studies on the impacts of trails sortable by type of benefit, use, year, and region. The library helps community leaders, elected officials, trail users, and others better understand the benefits of trails, and focuses on four main themes: business, quality of life, property value, and public health impacts. Headwaters Economics also conducted a survey for Teton County, Wyoming, finding that nine out of ten respondents utilized the regions trails and pathways. The survey was part of ongoing research by Headwaters Economics to provide comprehensive information on trails and pathways to help community leaders, elected officials, trail users, and others better understand the uses and benefits of area trails and pathways. Headwaters Economics published an interactive map and related explanatory post on the Three Wests. The updated study shows that there are three distinct types of counties in the West: Metro, Connected, and Isolateddefined by their access to major markets and population centers. The three types of western counties were shown to have different economic performance and socioeconomic characteristics. For future rural development, access to major cities is an important indicator of likely economic and demographic performance. Headwaters Economics conducted a study on the economic development opportunities in Wheeler County, Oregon. Like many rural counties in the West, Wheeler County faces economic difficulties. It also has untapped resources and opportunities, which suggest the possibility of a brighter economic future. The study recommends a focus on existing businesses to increase opportunities through infrastructure improvements to better access markets or by capturing spending from new visitors. It also proposes approaches that can help the county capitalize on its public lands, including new attractions, promoting tourism, translating visitation to residency, appealing to people who can work remotely, and reaching out to retirees. To better understand the economic value of public lands in Grand County, Utah, Headwaters Economics updated an earlier study commissioned at the request of a number of local interests, businesses, and officials to inform discussions about how to develop, protect, and manage nearby public lands so that they benefit local companies, the county, and diverse users. Headwaters Economics published an analysis and interactive graphics looking at the increase of new residents and home construction in the changing landscape of the High Divide region along the Idaho and Montana border. The study loo
