Doctor on mission to clear air, save soil

LUBBOCK — To we mere mortals, soil is a nonrenewable resource, a resource, which in hot, dry often windy West Texas can easily vanish in a cloud of dust, said a Texas A&M AgriLife Research soil scientist at Lubbock.

Dr. Katie Lewis is on a long-term mission to clear the air and save the soil of West Texas. Aside from her professional career, she's furthered tied to the land as the daughter of a South Texas farmer and wife of a Terry County farmer.

"The farming link, really to me is what drives me on a daily basis," Lewis said. "I know for a farmer to continue to farm and for farmers to continue to farm 100 years from now, we have to be aware of what we're doing to our soil."

"And so, the research we are conducting is really focused on soil management. How do we better utilize this nonrenewable resource? When we have a dust storm whip through, not an uncommon event here on the South Plains, we can lose a good half inch to an inch of our topsoil. That topsoil is what contains the majority of the soil organic matter and nutrients that feed our crops. That's also where all the microbial activity is occurring."

"It takes about 500 years to replace that inch of topsoil," she said. "That's why it's not renewable, to those in the here and now anyway. It's absolutely necessary we use the best management to maintain the productivity of our soil."

Lewis said many folks have probably heard of soil health, but may not really know what it means. She said it's the continued capacity of the soil to provide a habitat for microbes and animals and sustain plants, animals and humans.

Conservation or reduced tillage and the use of cover crops, crops planted over the winter to hold the soil in place for example, can all factor into improving soil health, she said.

"Everybody that's spent any time in West Texas has seen a dust storm," Lewis said. "A winter cover crop can really help hold that soil down and in place. One of the issues keeping farmers from planting a cover crop here is that cover crops need moisture to grow like every crop. As that cover crop is growing, it's using moisture. If we didn't have the cover crop, that moisture would likely be stored in the soil and available for the cash crop," she said.

"Our research in this area really centers around trying to optimize when to terminate the cover crop so we can maintain or reduce that deficit of moisture at planting time of the cash crop."

Lewis said one of the projects is an 18-year no-till rye cover crop project. Over the past several years a mixed cover crop has been planted to compare a conventional cotton tillage system a no-till rye cover crop and a no-till mixed cover crop. The mixed cover crop includes rye, hairy vetch, radish and winter pea.

"The benefit of the mixed cover is to provide diversity and to potentially increase the amount of soil nitrogen as the result."

But it's not all bad news, as she said the team approach among researchers at Lubbock has revealed some other benefits especially with crop rotations. Dr. Terry Wheeler, AgriLife Research plant pathologist at Lubbock, working at the same AG-CARES farm in Lamesa, found a cotton, wheat, fallow rotation can reduce nematode pressure compared to continuous cotton planted in rye cover, Lewis said.

"Compared to a continuous system, that rotation really does provide benefits beyond just reducing soil erosion," she said. "I think through continued research, we will be able to reach a point where we can successfully use cover crops as well as maintain our cotton yields to improve the health of our soil."

Lewis said the main thing farmers need to do is know their system. If their land is irrigated, they can be more successful with a cover crop on the South Plains than dryland farmers at the mercy of rainfall.

"I think with more knowledge, cover crops can be a useful tool in this area," she said. "But we are working to answer the many questions that surround the practice and develop better systems in this unique area."

Conditions good for crawfish producers amid an expanding Texas market

Texas crawfish producers are expected to have a good year as demand continues to increase in larger markets, said a Texas A&M AgriLife Extension Service expert.

Dr. Todd Slink, AgriLife Extension fisheries specialist in College Station, said early reports from crawfish producers in southeast Texas indicate it will be an average to above-average year.

"At this point, we're about 8 percent lower in production than last year, meaning for every 10 pounds produced last year we're producing around 9.2 pounds," he said. "That might sound bad but production was up so far last year that we're still doing well."

In 2016, a mild winter, coupled with heavy spring rains and wet conditions throughout the season allowed Texas crawfish producers to increase production around 19 percent. Slink said.

"Anytime we get a mild winter and it stays wet, it's typically good," he said. "Crawfish are active longer and continue to grow. Last year was just out of this world."

Mild winters can mean crawfish season can begin in early February, while cold winters can push the season kickoff into March, he said. Producers begin to serve local and area consumers as soon as crawfish exit dormancy and begin serving other markets as their numbers increase.

Slink said the crawfish market has expanded over the last 15-20 years. "There are a lot more people eating crawfish nationally," he said. "Crawfish used to be viewed as a strange little bug by people outside of Louisiana and southeast Texas, but it's less taboo and there has been more and more demand for them."

Slink said demand in Texas markets like Austin, Dallas and San Antonio has prodded producers to expand their capacity and has brought new producers into crawfish farming.

Prices can hover in the low-$2 per pound range for live crawfish from local producers, but it's not uncommon to see $3-4 per pound for live crawfish in distant markets when demand is high and transport costs are added, Slink said. Crawfish season during Lent, between Fat Tuesday and Easter, when demand can push prices higher.

Texas is No. 2 in U.S. crawfish production, well behind Louisiana, but well ahead of the next state, Slink said. "Louisiana produces about 90 percent of the crawfish, but they also consume about 90 percent of the crawfish they produce," Slink said. "They typically serve local and area demand before they start sharing."

Slink said most Louisiana crawfish farming compliments rice production, but most Texas producers grow their crawfish in permanently flooded ponds. There are seven large producers with 100-300 acres of capacity each, mostly in southeast Texas between Beaumont and Houston, but small-scale producers are entering the market as an opportunity for supplemental income as demand grows.

Good conditions this year are providing good opportunities for producers and decent prices for consumers, he said.

"We typically want to see about 600 pounds of crawfish per acre from our producers to be profitable," he said. "This year, some producers are seeing 700-750 pounds per acre."
