Collective Voices. UWEAST partnered with AJA: Youth & Photography Transformation to work with 15 East African Muslim refugee youth to run a year-long participatory photography project, commonly referred to as "Collective Voices". Under this program, refugee youth utilized the AJA Project's evaluated curriculum to explore aspects of migration, identity and culture through the medium of photography. Not only the program empowered individual participants to use photography to communicate messages about culture and identity to external audience, but also equipped the East African Muslim youth with leaderships and interpersonal skills to succeed in school, career, and civic engagement. Equally important, the community residents were exposed to large-scale installation which shows case students stories and identity. Residents were also engaged in productive dialogue around Muslim culture and identity through large-scale public art installation. In sum, The "Collective Voices program successfully created a large scale public art installation which serves a platform to ignite public dialogue around important issues of refugee settlement and social inclusion, particularly the East African Muslim community in City Heights.
