The mission of JUMP is to look beyond todays technology horizon and lay the scientific groundwork that extends the viability of Moores Law economics through 2040. This program must create new general purpose architectures and system designs that relax device constraints and provide opportunities for new device types and novel, heterogeneous integration solutions. It must invent new devices and designs that are capable of the performance achievable today at a power consumption that is 1-3 orders of magnitude lower. Finally, it must train tomorrows workforce to deliver smart, autonomous, safe, connected, efficient, and affordable electronics that meet our sensing, actuation, communication, computing, and storage needs for 2025 and beyond. In addition to providing enabling technologies, the research scope for each Center represents a critical component in the development of systems for both the semiconductor and defense industries and the Department of Defense.
